

Evil has dibs on earth, as he was cast down on it while it was still a rock of fire storms. He sees god as an evil being, feels God created Evil to make him into a tool, while then claiming his other creation "man" to be above Evil. Evil sees this as a mockery and misuse of the god power. He becomes aware of a dimensional down-cycle that God wants to experience, and sees this as his chance to dominate him if he can be evolutionarily superior when God reaches the earth in a flesh vessel. Waiting on Earth to evolve was miserable, but Evil learned many things about the elemental nature of the cosmos, and may have even gave up his plan for vengeance during the golden dawn, when earth was a paradise for evil to float through its purple haze, feasting on the earth's giant bounties. But once venus and saturn smashed against eachother, the Earth became worse than hell, covered in water, destroying everything Evil was beginning to love. He decided once God's precious humans populated the settled Earth, he would repeat the global flood disaster, so they would be programmed with the same fear and uncertainty that previously caught Evil off guard. God must know the existential dread that he forced upon Evil, without anyone to make the same declaration that gave Evil his name. Incarnating as man leaves God clueless as to what caused the catastrophe, and Evil began convincing man to see these disasters as clock work. Evil was surprised to see man quickly map out the stars to keep precise track of time, and kept man supplied with false information, forming alliances with the most creative and intelligent variations of man, teaching them that they were part of an all-good brotherhood who helped all of man progress. Man would spend many thousands of years trying to balance the teachings with their own experiences, and anyone who came to close to distinguishing a source of manipulation, was quickly executed by less-bright, more obedient members of the so called brotherhood. This would earn them a rank-up (which were made up whenever the need arose) Eventually man came up with it's own explanation, which concluded that God was responsible for both the good and the bad cycles, and that man's survival depended on them taking the reigns of control from God, which made them feel an ethical duty to control all of the earth's population and resources. Evil decided to let man advance, seeing the technological future which might allow Evil to travel into the Ether and directly encounter God between incarnations. If he could evolve enough to overpower god, he could trap him in timespace, and he would be unable to access the universe whatsoever, effectively allowing Evil to hijack the entirety of creation. What fun! Perhaps God programmed this entire thing as a redemption arc, since it felt Evil was destined to take the throne once everything is said and done. The geniuses from Thoth's planet successfully emulated an emulation which confirmed Evil taking the throne, which then causes the end of the universe, a mutually unfortunate destination for everyone involved. Evil now thinks God successfully pulled a 4-D chess, setting in motion the unavoidable conclusion where evil and the earth he coveted would all be destroyed, God did not mind wasting all that time and energy, if it meant spiting Evil over and over again. His paranoia causes him to mobilize man in search of God, and in search of a way to stalemate this nefarious plan, and allow Evil to reign over a stabilized universe. Thoth has passed wisdom onto the inventors who are enslaved by Evil. They build what he wants, but has no idea the target in his ethereal scanner is merely the 4th (shadow) phase of Evil himself. As long as he is chasing his own tail, there will be no conclusive end to the timeline, and man can eventually become wise to the dance they are doing on the world stage. SOUNDS FUN, just like God expected before splitting into infinite fractals and incarnating into the humans he was so amused creating.
